CHAPTER II

ANIMALS

CARNIVOROUS ANIMALS

136 Various animals live on the pastures visited by the Rwala.

The fahad, panther, is found particularly on the uplands to the northeast of the depression on Sirḥân as well as in the environs of al-Ḥazel.

The kurṭa is a beast of prey similar to the wildcat, only larger, dark yellow in color, with cropped ears ending with a tuft of long straight hairs. It lives in the territories of al-Heǧera and al-Labbe. It lies in wait for gazelles and is fond of hiding itself in the dry annuals, al-ḥemri. The breeze blows the hairs on its ears as it moves the annuals; the gazelles are thus misled and approach it, whereupon it leaps on to their backs, thrusts its claws into their throats, and sucks their blood.

The ẓab'a, hyena, dwells in large numbers in dens on the aṭ-Ṭawîl range. By day it is timid, but by night it infests the whole territory, opens graves, devours corpses, attacks wounded or ailing camels, and even preys on crying babies.
224 It has three or four cubs. If the Bedouins observe its fresh spoor near a den, they surround the den, bring a long rope, make a noose in it, and send one of their number after the hyena. The hunter slips the noose on his left arm, crawls along on his stomach, draws the rope after him, and gropes cautiously on all sides searching for the beast. As soon as he catches hold of it, he shouts: "It isn't here, this isn't it! isn't here! I have found a piece of old sheepskin, but it isn't here!" In the meanwhile he slips the noose round the hyena's neck and crawls out. At a given sign his comrades draw the hyena
262 out, kill it, and eat its flesh. The flesh of the young hyenas, about six months old, who are living with their mother, is 825 particularly appetizing. The teeth of the hyena, hung round
751 the neck, protect children against various diseases. The gall of 278 the hyena, when mixed with water and taken as a drink,
757 assuages fever.

dug dens for himself and his numerous family. To the rest of his subjects he said nothing. When he used to come from his work into the assembly, his whole forehead was gray with dust and clay. His companions asked him: "What makes thy forehead gray?" "Constant praying, during which I touch the earth as is prescribed." One day the guards who had been posted on the boundary came running up, shouting: "The Arabs are approaching with dogs and weapons." Abu ḥamad and his family at once hid themselves in the dens which had been prepared, so that none of them perished.

The Rwala divide serpents into ḥajje and dâbb, the former being any short snake and the latter any long serpent, irrespective of whether it is venomous or not. In poetry the latter appellation is always used for venomous serpents. Of the short serpents they are afraid of the viper, eṣâ'i, which is found in the rocky desert, as well as of the batra and the ḥaṣaf, which live in the sandy desert. The latter crawl out only by night. During the daytime they dig themselves into the sand, so that the tips of their heads alone project.

Of the long serpents the ḥanîš is particularly venomous. It is one meter long, covered with patches of color, and swims in pools of rain water.

The skin shed by a serpent, silb, serves as a remedy for various diseases of the eye. The Rwala all eat the long serpents. The flesh of the short snakes they give to camels suffering from the disorder of the stomach known as roši and from caries, rasis.

The ḥarḏawn, chameleon, basks in sunny spots and nods its head at passers-by.

The ab-aṭ-ṭḥejḥ is smaller than the ḥarḏawn. It lives exclusively in the Nefûd, where it hides in the sand, leaving its head alone uncovered.

The malaṣ, a reptile similar to the ḥarḏawn, is found likewise in the Nefûd. It is spotted with red and black patches. Its flesh dried in the sun and ground to powder is eaten by impotent old men.

The solejmâni (or ǧlejmâni) and the ḥabanaṣijje are harmless lizards.

The ba'erṣi (or brejṣi) is a venomous lizard of the Nefûd. When a man is bitten by this lizard, he becomes very restless. He cannot remain in one place. If he is lying in the shade, he craves for the sun, and if he is carried into the
